Friends

✍Shreevalli Rai Martell

A crab was walking along the seashore. When it turned back to look at the path it had traveled, it saw its footprints clearly imprinted on the wet sand, looking like a beautiful Rangoli design. Seeing this, the crab felt immensely happy. Just then, a massive wave from the ocean crashed onto the shore and completely wiped out the crab's footprints. Filled with deep sadness, the crab questioned the ocean:
"You and I are such great friends. Yet, you went ahead and erased my beautiful footprints! What kind of justice is this?"
To this, the ocean replied: "You only saw me erasing your footprints, but look at who is right behind those prints. A little further away, a sea bird is following your tracks, trying to catch and eat you. I erased your footprints so that the bird couldn't find your path. If I hadn't done that, your life would have been in danger."
The Moral
Similarly, in our own lives, we face such situations. When we look at how our relatives, close friends, or well wishers behave with us sometimes, it can cause us deep emotional pain. However, even though they truly desire what is best for us, we fail to realize it in that moment.
